Cold in the Head.

There is at this season an almost universal tendency to "catch cold." This conventional expression signifies nothing less than inflammation of the mucous membrane which lines ents here January 19. We were the nostrals, and extends throughout the respiratory organs to the most Rev. Mr. Jewellry, of Pine Branch, minute bronchial passages. A curpassed through here going to Clover rent of cold air striking upon the neck Bottom, where he is now holding or throat, a draught from an open door or window, exposure to a cold atmosphere, improper protection of the feet in cold or stormy weatherany of these, to say nothing of graver causes, is often sufficient to provoke the dreaded complaint. If the disease does not extend down the windpipe to the lungs, producing "cold moved from this place to a farm near in the chest," accompanied with a cough, it may easily be checked if taken at the start, for an almost certain remedy for this disagreeable affliction is camphor in liquid form.

John Ruskin, who died at his home in England on January twentieth was one of the great writers who have been given to that country.

Most of his work was on art and he is often thought to be an artist only and to have no message for us common people in our common daily life. He was born in 1819, so was 81 years old when he died. In his childhood he was carefully trained by his mother-he was an only child-and among other things was required to memorize many chapters from the Bible. He often said in later life that he owed much of his command of good English to his familiarity with the grand, simple, and poetic Purport of Private Forestry. Gradually people are rising to a better understanding of the term "Forestry." They begin to see that eightyfive per cent of the woodlands in the United States are owned by private individuals, that the salient point in forestry is the business point, and that forestry does not have a chance to exist in this country unless it pays.

Here and there "fancy forestry' might be practiced for a short while in spite of its unproductiveness, but fancy forestry will never assume large proportions.

What the country needs is forestry on a grand scale, which, however, the country can have only by allowing I wish that every boy and girl might conservative lumbering to yield re-It is a turns at least equal to those expected by the capitalist from equally safe investments in other industries.

In Europe, investments in forests are considered safer than investments in government bonds. It is therefore that far sighted institutions, families and individuals are fond of forestry investments abroad. #### Forest Fires.

The main source of losses is fire ravaging the forest. Whilst old trees, protected by their heavy bark, are as a rule only damaged and weakened by a conflagration, young trees invariably succumb to it. No wonder, then, that the capitalist is anxious to rather withdraw his money from the forest as soon as he succeeds is selling whatever trees are marketable.
